I. BACKGROUND AND JUSTIFICATION

The Sahel region faces complex and severe humanitarian, security, political, development and human rights challenges. The countries of the Sahel share common structural vulnerabilities such as chronic political instability, weak state institutions, poor governance, poverty, limited effective coverage of basic social services, low rates of education, and weak economies. Human development in the Sahel is among the lowest in the world. These challenges are further compounded by high population growth, environmental degradation and the spectrum of more frequent and severe natural disasters due to the effects of climate change.

In 2012, an estimated nineteen million people are at risk of food insecurity and acute malnutrition, partially due to drought and po.

or harvests. Over one million children are suffering from severe acute malnutrition. As crises in the Sahel have become increasingly more frequent and severe in the past decades, the resilience of people and ability of communities to recover from shocks have been eroded.

Conflict, weak border management and the presence of transnational criminal and terrorist organizations have also resulted in the widespread flows of arms, drug trafficking and people. Insecurity in Mauritania, Niger, Chad and Mali has become particularly acute due to the heightened activity of terrorist and other criminal networks. The crises in Cote d'Ivoire and Libya last year further exacerbated those challenges leading to the proliferation of weapons, large number of (often armed) returnees, additional strains on already weak government capacities, and a loss of remittances. Since mid-January 2012, the complex emergency in northern Mali has led to the inflow of an estimated 168,000 refugees into Burkina Faso, Mauritania and Niger, in areas already severely affected by the drought. This situation has seen been further affected by the 21 March 2012 coup d'état in Mali.

National responses to the situation in the Sahel appear insufficient given the multiplicity and the trans-boundary nature of the challenges facing this vast area. Moreover, many initiatives continue to address the situation in the Sahel through a narrow "security prism". In this context and in line with the recommendations of the UN Inter-agency mission dispatched to the Sahel in December 2011, the formulation of a comprehensive UN strategy encompassing the peace and security, development and humanitarian pillars is warranted. As part of this strategy and through its multiple programs and activities in the region, the different parts of the UN System involved in the area could assist the sub-region in more effective and coherent way in order to ensure that the international community does not approach instability in the Sahel only from a security prism. It could also serve at improving the coherence, coordination and effectiveness of the activities and programs implemented by the various parts of the UN System in the region.

II. MAIN DUTIES OF THE CONSULTANT

In this highly complex and volatile climate, UNOWA would benefit from the work of a Senior Advisor with strong knowledge of the Sahel region, excellent analytical and mediation skills, as well as expertise in supporting national peace initiatives.
